Helping to feed the hungry at Thanksgiving, Lancaster Middle School student Jared Bowis (left) hands bags and boxes of canned goods to Tides Inn sales manager Gus Shelton, for delivery to the Central Virginia Food Bank. Between July 1 and September 30, 2004, the food bank distributed 18,801 pounds of food in Lancaster County and 6,956 pounds in Northumberland. The local food drive was sponsored by the Kilmarnock Chamber of Commerce, the Tides Inn and Bay 101.7 Radio Station. A drop-off was held last Friday at Tri-Star Supermarket in Kilmarnock. Food items had an estimated value of some $5,000 and over $1,000 was collected.

The groups spent two weeks collecting food from LMS students for the Central Virginia Food Bank, which helps to supply food to the hungry in the Northern Neck. The LMS students collected 1,330 cans of food with the fourth-grade class collecting 510 cans to win the schoolwide competition. (Photos by Lisa Hinton-Valdrighi)

Successful LMS program leads to prestigious high school band

by Lisa Hinton-Valdrighi

KILMARNOCK—The pursuit of musical excellence in Lancaster County schools begins in Room 904 at Lancaster Middle School.

Director Glen Burtner doesn't like to toot his own horn, although that's just what he was doing last week while instructing a group of novice band students.

Burtner grabbed his trumpet and joined in with his beginners, blowing out a Christmas tune that the group was learning for a Kilmarnock parade and holiday concert.

He stops and starts the musicians patiently, reminding himself that they are his sixth-grade class of newcomers. The group is part of a prestigious bunch of Lancaster County band students and will one day hopefully join the decorated Lancaster High School Marching Band, which in January performs in London in Her Majesty's New Year's Day Parade.

The community has rallied around the LHS band, raising nearly $125,000 for the trip.

"I don't know of another rural, small town community like this that gives so much support to its band," said Burtner.

He's been teaching band for 17 years at LMS, where most of the high school band members get their start.

With 60 percent of the LMS sixth-, seventh- and eighth-grade students participating, band is just as popular at the middle school level as it is in high school. Of the school's 351 students, 210 are band members.

When LMS students enter the sixth grade, they have to choose an expanded core class of either band, chorus, computer or visual arts. Most, it seems, choose band.

"The way I look at it," said Burtner, "the high school and middle school bands feed off of each other. The kids see how good the high school band is doing and the places they go and they want to do those things. But if we weren't turning out a good product down here, then the high school band wouldn't be what it is either."

By "we," Burtner means he and assistant director, Kenny Flester. Flester splits time between LMS and LHS, assisting both Burtner and high school director Robbie Spiers.

According to Burtner, the music program in Lancaster started to "take-off" in the early 1980s when the LHS marching band began traveling out of state to Florida and Pennsylvania.

It takes a lot of money to send hundreds of students on the trips, said Burtner, and although the high school band has several fund-raisers a year, Burtner limits his group to just one.

"We don't like to do it, but it's a necessary evil," Burtner said. "We do one at the beginning of the year and get it over with."

This year, they used about $1,500 of the proceeds to purchase a tuba and another $1,600 to purchase a recorder.

Burtner conducts five separate bands at LMS: three concert bands, a jazz band and a marching band.

Interest is so great that he and Flester are able to now audition students for the symphonic and jazz bands.

The classes are also split to include groups of novices and groups of more advanced performers.

At that age and level of experience, says Burtner, it takes the students about two months to learn a song well enough to "show it" at one of the bands' seven yearly performances.

The LMS marching band will be featured in the Kilmarnock Christmas parade on Friday, December 10, and the school's jazz, sixth-grade, concert and symphonic bands will perform a winter concert in the LMS Theater on Monday, December 20, at 7 p.m.

The bands also perform annually in September for Band Day in Kilmarnock, at a spring concert, at the area and all-district band competitions, at an area band festival and during a festival at either Kings Dominion or Bush Gardens.

Lancaster planners weigh PUD issues

by Robb Hoff

LANCASTER—Appeals for a continued public hearing process and questions about whether planned unit development (PUD) ordinances are really needed in Lancaster County were heard last Thursday when the county planning commission resumed discussions about the proposed tool to regulate large-scale developments.

Discussion focused on the provisions that would regulate all three of the PUDs currently proposed: waterfront residential (WRPUD), mixed commercial (MCPUD), and inland residential (RPUD).

One of the issues at the forefront of the discussion, which included public input, is the public hearing process planned for PUDs.

The PUD ordinances themselves will be held for public hearing by the planning commission once the draft is completed and advertised for hearing. County supervisors will hold another hearing before voting on adopting the measures.

However, if the ordinances are eventually adopted by the county board of supervisors, each PUD application that is submitted by a developer to the county will not be subject to a public hearing under the general requirements now being considered.

"There will be a hearing," said commissioner David Jones. "It's just that there won't be any public input."
